Japanese popular culture is becoming well known overseas. If you ask many young overseas students [13] they come to Japan, they will often say that they came because they were interested in Japanese manga and anime. One Piece, Golgo 13 and Dragon Ball are three of the most successful manga [14] have had English versions published since the mid 2000s. Anime versions in English have also been broadcast from the late 1990s. Of these three manga/anime series, Dragon Ball is perhaps the best [15]. Dragon Ball has a number of series but it begins with a teenage girl called Bulma who makes friends with a boy called Goku [16] has a monkey tail. Together, they try to find seven dragon balls [17] around the world. If they succeed [18] obtaining all seven balls, the dragon god Shenron appears and grants them one wish. In their quest, many other characters appear and the two encounter many obstacles and challenges. Various series of Dragon Ball have been made following the main characters as they grow from children to being adults. The story may seem to be modern fiction, but Dragon Ball received its inspiration from the Chinese 16th century novel Journey to the West, [19] to be one of the four great classical novels of Chinese literature. Here, a monk travels around central Asia and India to find ancient sacred Buddhist texts. Like Dragon Ball, Journey to the West became popular as a [20] story Monkey translated [21] English fifty years before Dragon Ball was similarly introduced [22] the West.

Ana: Hi Sakura, I need to find a part-time job over the summer because I want to go on the student overseas study trip in the autumn.

Sakura: You can always find a job in a convenience store .

Ana: I was thinking of a job in a convenience store, but I can't work too late.

Sakura: I think there are many stores where you don't have to work late. ?

Ana: Oh, that is easy. I will use the Townwork home page. All you do is select the area you want to work in and see what jobs are available.

Sakura: I have heard of Townwork, but I have never seen their home page. Is it really that simple?

Ana: Yes, after you have selected the area you want to work in, a list of jobs appears on the computer screen. .

Sakura: If it is that easy, perhaps I will look for a part time job too. .

Ana: Where are you thinking of going to?

Sakura: I think I would really like to go to New York. I have never been to America and I think New York would be a really exciting place to go to.

Ana: That's interesting. .

Sakura: Wow. But as I want to go in the summer, it's a shame I won't be able to see you there.

- ① how are you going to find a job
- ② I also want to go overseas on holiday and need to increase my savings
- ③ I am going to get a job in a clothing store.
- ④ I really want to work in a restaurant
- ⑤ it would be good to go to Chicago too
- ⑥ or work as a waitress in a restaurant
- ⑦ our student study trip also plans to go to New York too
- ⑧ you just select the job you want and fill in the application form

IV. 次の英文を読んで問1、問2に答えなさい。*がついた語句は文末に注がある。

Most Americans believe libraries do a decent job of serving the education and learning needs of their communities and their own families. A new survey by Pew Research Center shows that 76% of adults say libraries serve the learning and educational needs of their communities either “very well” (37%) or “pretty well” (39%). Further, 71% say libraries serve their own personal needs and the needs of their families “very well” or “pretty well.”

As a rule, libraries’ performance in learning arenas* gets better marks from women, blacks, Hispanics, those in lower-income households, and those ages 30 and older. At the same time, (A) learning-related programs and materials such as e-books, career and job resources, and high school certification courses.

Additionally, these views arise in a context where strong majorities of adults consider themselves “lifelong learners” and libraries around the country are working to fit their programs and services into local educational ecosystems – both the formal parts of it (such as schools) and the informal parts of it (such as “do it yourself” learning opportunities). A recent Pew Research report found that 73% of adults say the label “lifelong learner” applies “very well” to them. Additionally, (B) personal learning experiences of various kinds in the previous 12 months – we call them personal learners. And 63% of full- and part-time workers have taken courses or done training on the job to improve their skills in the past year – we called them professional learners.

Recent library users overwhelmingly embrace those ideas and activities. Fully 97% of those who used a library or bookmobile in the past 12 months say that the term “lifelong learner” applies “very well” or “pretty well” to them and a similar share of library website users (98%) also strongly identified with being lifelong learners. Moreover, 84% of those who visited a library in the past 12 months fit our definition of personal learner, compared with 66% of those who had not recently visited a library or bookmobile.

Recent library users are more likely than others to read “how to” publications, take courses related to personal interests, attend learning-related events and meetings, and take online courses. Interestingly, among workers, recent library users are (C) fall into the category of professional learners. In addition to examining the role of libraries as contributors to people’s learning, this survey also continued the Center’s benchmarking* of library usage. Only some 78% of adults say they have ever gone to a library, while 44% say they went to a library or bookmobile in the past 12 months. The findings indicate a downward drift in the number of those who use physical library facilities in any given year. In our first survey on this in November 2012, 53% of adults had visited a library or bookmobile in the past 12 months. Over the same period, the use of library websites has leveled off. In 2013, 30% of adults had used a library website over the past 12 months, while the new finding is that 31% have done so in the past year. Additionally, we found that 9% of adults had used a library-related app in the past 12 months – a first time reading for this question.
